How the Quit Smoking 21 Days Program Works Research has discovered that it takes four to ten repetitions of a thought pattern to create a seed that will grow into action. Lets say that you accept an invitation to spend the weekend water-skiing. The inboard engine on your friends boat has no cover. He warns you about it but you forget, accidently press your leg against the engine, and get burned. Your friends warning didnt register, but the second one- a blister on your leg- did. After that, youll keep your bare skin away from that engines hot metal for the rest of the day. One effective input- or was it more? Actually, every time you get near the engine, a highly emotional thought pattern will flash through your mind: touching the engine hurts. This thought pattern is a self-instruction. Every time you rub the burn on your leg that night, you'll get another repetition of the same thought pattern. When you go water skiing the second day, you'll remember to keep your bare arms and legs away from that engine. Most people limit themselves to self-instructions of this sort, the ones that chance imposes on them as they plod through life. Since the most powerful of these self-instructions are painful memories, most people are reluctant to try new things. Their minds are shot through with variations of, You better not try that or you'll be sorry. Every successful person, on the other hand, has some understanding of self-instructions, and uses positive thought patterns to create effective action. These are the people who say, I can do that. Then they do it. We make Quitting Smoking EASIER when You WANT to Quit
